	Subtitle: International Law & Diplomacy NOTE: This course on International Law and Diplomacy will first examine the sources, substance and significance of international law in contemporary international affairs. Students will become familiar with the traditional basis of state jurisdiction, as well as those of international courts such as International Court of Justice or the International Criminal Court (ICC). Competing theories of the International Legal Order, such as "constitutionalism" and the modern "Law of Nations" will be examined in depth as well. The international law dealing with diplomacy, war and peace will be studied and case studies presented; in particular, the Charter of the United Nations, and especially the preventive powers of the UN Secretary General, will be discussed in terms of the UN's current problems and potential. Finally, the emergent phenomenon of "global legal pluralism"

	NOTE: "This course examines the dynamics of self-examination in conflict resolution. It explains how conflicts surge from a lack of inner-self peace or from subjects' internal instability and how self-examination should be a critical stage in any process of conflict resolution and peacemaking. The course will clarify the concept of self-examination and presents it benefits for conflict resolution and all parties involved in the process. The orientation of the course will be dynamic, using specific cases and taking into account recent developments in local, regional, and global affairs."

		NOTE: How do we define black art? Can "good" art create political change? Should it? This course traces the evolution of debates from the Harlem Renaissance (1919) to the present regarding the black culture, the arts, and political activism among African-American writers, activists, and political leaders. Meets General Education IB (Prior to Fall 2008:1A).
*3455	ENGL 384-001	NATIVE AMERICAN LITERATURE	4	LEC MW		03:00PM -04:15PM	PH 263	QUINTANA WULF
		NOTE: ENGL384: Space and Place in Contemporary Native American Literature In this course we will read contemporary Native American literature as we work to understand how the notions of "place" and "space" shape Indigenous experiences and identities in the US. Following social and cultural geographer Tim Cresswell's theorizations of the marked difference between space (abstract concept) and place (concrete experience), we will examine how place "needs to be understood as an embodied relationship with the world. Places are constructed by people doing things and in this sense are never 'finished' but are constantly being performed" (Place). As we carefully consider the relationship between space and place, we will start by considering the differences between Euro-American cartographic practices and Indigenous mapmaking. Then we will read works by Native

		NOTE: What might we learn when we to train our fear and loathing, our pity and disgust upon the screen? This course sets out to do just that by examining films that actively invite our "bad feelings" toward them. While some of these films will run the range from being "so bad they're good" to just plain awful, we will also attend to films and critical writings that open up onto topics such as obscenity and prohibition, the occult, cinephobia, taste and cultural value, and the aesthetics of cruelty.

A close cousin to filmic mockumentaries like The Office and the “found footage” of Paranormal Activity, fraudulent literary artifacts are fictional narratives masquerading as “real” nonfiction texts or “authentic” documents, such as fake letters (Frankenstein), counterfeit dictionaries (Dictionary of the Khazars), faux interview transcripts (World War Z), hypothetical biographies (Mother Night), or fabricated alternative history textbooks (For Want of a Nail). Students may bring to workshop any of their current writing projects; however, some experimentation with the class topic will be required. Using the anthology

 Subtitle: World in the Twentieth Century

NOTE: This course surveys selective topics in world history during the twentieth century. It focuses on political, economic, social, cultural, and military trends as well as representative events and people that are particularly important to today's world. The course covers much, but by no means all, of the globe. Special topics include the two world wars; Nazism and the Holocaust; the Cold War; decolonization; revolutionary change in Russia, China, and Iran; and the emergence of the Global South, especially the Middle East, India, and China.

 Subtitle: Race, Identity, and Migration

NOTE: This course will introduce students to some of the major patterns in world history since 1500 CE. What makes this particular class experience unique is that we will be exploring the development of our modern world through modern concepts of race and different forms of human "identity," all while trying to understand how these ideas have been influenced by the growth of imperialism. The course is not designed to cover the history of the entire world since 1500, but rather to explore general topics and themes by looking at specific historical episodes that relate to concepts of migration, immigration, race, ethnicity, and identity. The primary goal is to provide students with new and wider perspectives beyond formulaic narratives and to evaluate historical sources and contemporary issues in hopes of arriving beyond issues in history.

	NOTE: The purpose of this course is to study the interactions between cultures and religions in the medieval Mediterranean from the seventh century of the Common Era to about 1500 CE. The course will focus on the shifting relations between Christians, Muslims, and Jews through the investigation of four spheres of contact. These include the MIDDLE EAST AND BYZANTIUM, the IBERIAN PENINSULA, EGYPT AND NORTH AFRICA, and the OTTOMAN AND VENETIAN competing landscape of the early modern period. Because relations between the three Abrahamic religions remain one of the most vexed issues in today's world, special attention will be paid to the ramifications of the study of the past for our understanding of the present.

Subtitle: Cnfrntg Inequality/Achievg Sus

NOTE: The weekly series explores relationships between sustainability and a wide range of inequalities to provide an overview of equity issues affecting progress toward environmental and social justice and sustainability. SU faculty along with guest speakers and community members examine inequality and sustainability through a multiplicity of lenses, investigating socio-political, historical, environmental, economic, and other factors affecting progress toward a sustainable world. The course lectures and readings seek to widen your understanding of how inequalities influence strategies to achieve sustainability, challenge your assumptions, and increase your awareness of issues of equity connected with environmental and social justice and sustainability. You will also become informed about opportunities in the local community to put what you learn
